Methodology

The survey findings presented in this release are based on the results of interviews conducted September 15 – 21, 2008. The interviews were conducted at the Center for Opinion Research at Franklin and Marshall College under the direction of the poll's director, Dr. G. Terry Madonna, Head Methodologist Berwood Yost, Project Manager Jennifer Harding, and Project Manager Brad Nankerville. The data included in this release represent the responses of 1,320 adult residents of the United States who are currently registered to vote. Telephone numbers for the survey were generated using random digit dialing, and respondents were randomly selected from within each household. Survey results were weighted using an iterative weighting algorithm.

The sample error for registered adults is +/- 2.7 percent. In addition to sampling error, this poll is also subject to other sources of non-sampling error. Generally speaking, two sources of error concern researchers most. Non-response bias is created when selected participants either choose not to participate in the survey or are unavailable for interviewing. Response errors are the product of the question and answer process. Surveys that rely on self-reported behaviors and attitudes are susceptible to biases related to the way respondents process and respond to survey questions.

Key Findings

The Presidential Election

The September 2008 Franklin and Marshall College Poll of registered adults finds Democrat Barack Obama trailing Republican John McCain by two points, 45% to 43%. McCain's advantage is the same when undecided but leaning voters are included, 47% to 45%. McCain has an advantage among men, those over 55 years of age, non-Hispanic whites, fundamentalist Christians, Southerners, and military veterans (see Table A-1). Obama leads among women, those under 35, non-Hispanic blacks, and residents of the Northeast.

The largest changes in candidate preference since our June survey are among fundamentalist Christians, white men, and white women. McCain's advantage over Obama among fundamentalist Christians has increased from 8 points to 30 points; his advantage among white men has increased from 7 points to 28 points; and his advantage among white women has increased from 5 points to 17 points. Candidate preference among partisans has also changed since June. McCain has more support among Republicans than Obama has among Democrats; McCain also has an advantage among Independent voters that he did not have in June (Figure 1). The survey also found that McCain's favorability ratings increased from 34% in June to 49%, while Obama's favorable ratings have remained mostly unchanged.

September 2008

June 2008

Perceptions about the candidates' skills and abilities tend to provide an advantage for John McCain. First, far more respondents believe McCain has the experience needed to be president (Figure 2). He also has a clear advantage in protecting the United States against terrorism and handling the war in Iraq. Obama's only sizable advantage is in understanding the concerns of ordinary Americans.

Question: Which candidate, (rotated) Barack Obama or John McCain, do you think is best DESCRIBED by each of the following statements?

Half of registered adults believe that John McCain will mostly continue economic (49%) and foreign policies (57%) put into place by President Bush, although more Democrats and Independents than Republicans believe this is true (Table 1). Respondents who believe McCain will follow Bush policies are more likely to plan to vote for Obama. More registered voters would be concerned if Obama were elected President (56%) than if McCain were elected President (44%). More Democrats are concerned about Obama (39%) than are Republicans concerned about McCain (16%). About one quarter of registered voters in each party who have concerns about Obama cite his lack of experience as their main concern.

Attitudinal variables are also associated with vote choice. Three in four (73%) registered adults believe the country is “off on the wrong track,” and two in five (38%) say they are worse off financially this year than last. Obama is currently leading among both of these groups (Table 2). The economy (44%) is most often mentioned as the issue that will influence presidential vote choice in the fall, and Obama leads McCain among registered adults who are concerned primarily with this issue.
